

Issues in American Politics and Government

Thomas J. Leeper
Department of Political Science and Government
Aarhus University

November 14, 2014

The United States is a unique political system. It is one of the longest-running democracies in the world, has a relatively rare presidential system, has been politically defined by only two major parties for the better part of its history, is populated by a broad mix of racial, ethnic, religious, economic, and cultural groups, and takes an aggressive, frequently independent, role in other countries' affairs. This seminar dives into several important aspects of American democracy and politics to understand what shapes political activity in the United States. Students will leave the course with a deep understanding of the institutional, historical, philosophical, and cultural factors that shape American politics and will be able to better analyze policymaking and political events in the United States as a result. Broadly the course asks students to consider why things are the way they are in the United States and why things happen the way they do. In addressing these questions, the emphasis is placed on answering the questions 'who has power in the United States?' and 'what do they do with it?'

1 Objectives

The learning objectives for the course are as follows. By the end of the course, students should be able to:

1. Identify and explain dominant themes that shape (and have shaped) the dynamics of American politics from the founding to the present
2. Describe political polarization in the contemporary United States, as well as its origins and political effects
3. Describe political and economic inequalities in the United States and their consequences for political activity and policymaking
4. Explain institutional roles and functions of branches of the federal government, states, citizens, media, parties, and other political actors
5. Discuss the roles and power of citizens in American government and policymaking
6. Apply knowledge of United States political history and political science theories to understand contemporary political events
7. Evaluate activities of American political institutions and citizens, including their de jure powers and de facto operations

2 Exam

Students will be evaluated via an oral examination with a written synopsis based upon issues raised in the course. The exam will be held on Friday December 19th and Thursday January 29th.

In preparation for the exam, students are expected to offer weekly presentations (either individually or in small groups). These presentations will cover the week's reading material and involve leading a discussion on that material. Each student should be involved in at least three such presentations during the course.

3 Reading Material

The assigned material for the course consists of empirical research articles and book chapters, all of which are available online or in the printed compendium. There is no textbook.

4 Course Website

All information about the course will be posted on <http://www.thomasleeper.com/ampolcourse>. Any changes to the syllabus or additional notes will be made available there.

5.11 Exam Preparation I: Public Policy (Week 46) (Meet 9:15–11:00)

The purpose of today's class is to continue our conversation about policy controversies in the United States and use that discussion to lead toward individual synopsis topics. Specifically, the readings for this week highlight some ongoing controversies in contemporary American politics. Thinking about each of the controversies raised in the readings, discuss as a group how political institutions (Congress, the President, the Supreme Court, states, etc.), political parties, and public opinion influence contemporary policies and politics in these areas.

After your discussions, use remaining time to generate ideas for your own synopsis. What controversy would you like to explore and what factors will you examine to better understand that controversy? It is important to be specific and focused. Trying to explain the controversy of "federalism" or "race" will be too broad for a reasonable synopsis. Instead, focus your attention on a specific political controversy and try to use your understanding of political institutions (Congress, President, Supreme Court, states, etc.), political actors (politicians, political parties, etc.), and American opinions and values to make sense of that controversy. Focused topics might be, for example, the status of gay marriage, the degree of U.S. involvement in a particular international crisis, or similar.

If you are interested in meeting with the instructor to discuss your topic, please make arrangements for a meeting on November 17, 18, or 19 via email.

5.12 Politics of Race and Inequality (Week 47)

Meet 8:00–12:00 in Building 1330 Large Meeting Room in Political Science Faculty Kantine

How much inequality is there in the United States and what forms does inequality take? What impacts does inequality have on American society and politics? What do Americans think about inequality? In what ways to race influence political beliefs, attitudes, and behaviors? How are policies racialized and race politicized?

5.13 Exam Preparation II (Week 48)

This week is set aside for exam preparation. The idea is for you to receive feedback on your written synopsis from your peers and practice defending that synopsis in a mock oral exam.

The class should be conducted as follows:

- Each student will be assigned (randomly) two other students who will serve as examiners (see below).

Presenter	Discussant 1	Discussant 2
Sara	Rikke	Sabrina
Francesca	Mikkel	Anne
Sofus	Sarah	Christian
Daniel	Mette	Rikke
Sabrina	Anne	Mikkel
Kristian	Marie	Sarah
Anne	Michelle	Mette
Christian	Sara	Britta
Rikke	Francesca	Marie
Mikkel	Sofus	Francesca
Sarah	Daniel	Sara
Mette	Sabrina	Sofus
Britta	Kristian	Michelle
Marie	Britta	Kristian
Michelle	Christian	Daniel

- Each student should submit a written draft of their synopsis to their co-examiners 48 hours before class (i.e., by Tuesday morning).
- In class, each student should prepare a 2–3 minute presentation of their synopsis for the whole class.
- After the short presentation, the examiners should ask the presenter questions about the synopsis, with reference to ideas, theories, actors, and institutions discussed in the course. This should take about 5 minutes.
- Examiners may also provide written feedback about the synopsis.
- After all the presentations and cross-examinations, please open a general discussion about the synopses and arrive at any questions you have as a group about the synopsis and the exam as a whole.

5.14 Polarization (Week 49)

Is American politics polarized? Why? Is there a “culture war” in the United States? What implications does that have for politics, policymaking, and everyday life?
